There are numerous signs you need a divorce: You're fighting with your partner frequently, you've grown incompatible, or you are both downright unhappy. Regardless of the reason, it's important you consult with a divorce lawyer as soon as you recognize your legal union is not working out.

Your first impulse at the onset of the divorce process may be to represent yourself in order to save time and money. However, divorcing a spouse involves a lot of decision-making that can significantly alter your future, and potentially that of dependents, as well.

Why You Should Seek Divorce Consultation

If your divorce is contested, involves children, or you possess numerous shared assets, it can be helpful to have a legal representative by your side. Here is a look at five critical reasons for speaking to a Utah divorce attorney as soon as you start deliberating about ending your marriage:

Staying Objective

One of the best ways a divorce lawyer helps you is by providing a rational, objective voice during a time rife with heightened emotions, such as depression, confusion, betrayal, or sadness. If you're early in the stages of divorce, chances are you haven't had the opportunity to process your feelings yet, which leaves you vulnerable to making rash or emotion-driven decisions. Your Utah divorce attorney keeps a level head as you collaborate on working toward a fair resolution.

Suggesting Creative Alternatives

Divorce attorneys have handled dozens, if not hundreds, of divorce cases, which means they can tell you the likely outcome of your case if you take it to court. With that foresight, they also can suggest a variety of options for settling your case that you might not know existed. From creating a reasonable settlement proposal to deciding how to handle a proposal from your spouse's side, they save you time, money, and work by approaching the process with the right expectations.

Keeping an Eye on the Big Picture

During the long, arduous divorce process, it's common to get tunnel-vision and focus on several small things rather than looking at the big, long-term picture. Coming up with a legally-acceptable settlement for both parties requires compromise. Divorce lawyers reinforce the importance of focusing on the big picture and help identify areas where you can or should compromise to resolve the case.

Navigating Family Court

If you are unfamiliar with family court procedures or matrimonial law, you will find yourself out of your depth when appearing before a judge with your soon-to-be ex-spouse. Judges don't give special treatment to people who are self-represented. You'll be held to the same standard of legal understanding that your divorce attorney would be. Being unprepared or saying the wrong thing in court can jeopardize your case, so it's better to go into the process with a family law expert.

Handling Paperwork

Even if your divorce is not contested or contentious, there is still paperwork to be filed, with different forms required for different situations. Collecting information, filling out the forms, and filing them with the court can be a tedious and draining process. If you don't file properly or if you accidentally leave off information, you slow down the process and even risk losing credibility on your case. Your Utah divorce attorney makes sure all the right paperwork is filled out correctly and persuasively from the get-go.
