What Is Emancipation in Utah?

First, emancipation takes place when a person under the age of 18 is fully independent of their parents or legal guardian. While the emancipation age by the state will vary, the emancipation age in the state of Utah is 16.

In Utah, there are three separate ways that someone under the age of 18 can become fully emancipated. They include:

- Someone under the age of 18 could get married
- There could be a military order that emancipates someone in the state of Utah
- There could be a court order that results in the emancipation of a minor

When it comes to a court order, it is helpful to rely on emancipation lawyers in Utah who have experience in this field and can walk someone through this process.

Asking for a Court Order for Emancipation in Utah

When thinking about how to get emancipated in Utah, one of the most common ways is to ask for a court order. In Utah, a minor who is 16 years of age or older can ask the juvenile court to declare him or her emancipated. The minor has to show the court that:

- He or she can live independently from his or her parents or guardian
- He or she can manage his or her financial affairs

Before this process can be completed, the minor has to let his or her parents or legal guardians know that this process is going to take place. Then, there is a pre-trial hearing during which each side will present its case.

What Are the Effects of Emancipation?

If someone is looking at getting emancipated, it is also important to know what this process will do. After completing the process of emancipation, a minor will be able to:

- Sue someone else or be sued
- Enter into contracts without requiring a parent
- Purchase and sell property
- Obtain healthcare without requiring the consent of a legal guardian
- Take out a loan

At the same time, emancipation will not allow a minor to purchase tobacco, own firearms, vote, drink alcohol, or smoke until he or she reaches the requisite age. Furthermore, an emancipated will not be considered an adult in a criminal court of law unless certain conditions are met as they relate to a crime.
